DEEP SPACE: ALIEN CONTACT... and a nightmare for the men from earth

'Looking out through the transparent, filtering dome of the Pegasus' observation deck, Div watched the twin stars of the Aldebaran system and imagined that he could see the tiny island of life which had brought him here – Tin Woodman. Closing his eyes, he could see it clearly, as it had appeared on Galvern's holographs. He saw the long, slender ovoid, glistening silver in the radiation of the great nuclear lights – not the hard, glinting silver of steel, but the rainbow-faceted gleam of a rare and beautiful fish . . .'

TIN WOODMAN

DENNIS R BAILEY and DAVID F BISCHOFF

Tin Woodman – the slumbering metal axeman in the land of Oz and now, in the 24th century, an alien starship: metallic, dormant, empty – but alive . . .

The crew of the Pegasus are powerless to act; only the telepath, Div Harlthor, on special assignment from Earth, can hope to establish contact. But when he tries, he finds himself on the threshold of an amazing metamorphosis – a startling transformation that takes him on an incredible odyssey towards some ultimate, unearthly destiny.

A Nebula Award nominee as an original short story – now a dazzling new novel. A powerful account of strange contacts and stranger relationships. 182pp [REF NO 5171]

THE EARLY POHL

'Autobiography is a form of dissipation that should not be permitted to mortal man. It inflames the ego and wrenches the organs of nostalgia. I love it.' – and so will you, when you time-travel with Fred Pohl – back to his early years, when sf meant pulp magazines, readers and fans were few, and a young writer's first sale brought in a welcome wartime $2.

Eight great Pohl stories from those early days are reprinted here – all of them as fresh, lively, and original as ever, and all made extra-special by Pohl's inimitable and delightful commentaries, full of anecdotes and recollections of Asimov, Kornbluth, and other forties friends – a feast of entertainment for all sf connoisseurs. 7¼ x 5in / 183pp
