The Ceres Solution

'Gretana opened her eyes to a night-time world in which faint stars scarcely penetrated barriers of radiance thrown up by encirclements of floodlights and brilliantly illuminated buildings . . . Never before having completed an interstellar transfer, she felt both awed and humbled by the magnitude of her achievements, by the powers of the Mollanian mind-science she had always taken for granted.'

Earth in the 21st century — teeming, frantic, rushing towards self-inflicted nuclear doom; Mollan — populated by inhabitants who have achieved great longevity and fantastic powers which include the ability to transport themselves from star to star. The Mollanians pursue a strict policy of isolationism to preserve their cool, introspective society . . . but the two cultures are destined to have a profound and fateful effect on each other . . .

GOD'S WORLD

IAN WATSON

His first novel of outer space

We're naked in High Space, seeing it directly: intense in incoherence. Hideous bubbling things live in this zone. Worm shapes burrow through the air, ingesting it, squeezing it out. Living balloons of light suck and pump. We're adrift in the bloodstream of some great beast of light . . . Space isn't empty at all but full of amorphous swarming creatures, entities, to which worlds and rocks and suns are transparent . . .

It is the world that is transparent! It's still 'here', but there's a zone beyond the world — another order of reality, beyond reality — that now shows through: another world that is utterly, sickeningly out of focus . . . In a moment the hell storm abates. Or the storm of Heaven. Heaven, misunderstood, ungrasped, out of focus, must be Hell . . .

When a ship is captured by insect-like creatures, the Group-ones, six members of the space expedition escape to the planet 'God's World', where fantasy becomes reality. But are the Group-ones really the enemy they seem — or does 'God's World' pose a more sinister threat? 7¼ x 4¼in / 254pp
